For those of us who don't live in the USA, who never had the chance to take on the solemn obligation of voting, it may seem strange that such an important obligation as the right to vote must be fought for every single year. In the USA there are no elections that do not have their battles. However, it may seem stranger still that people not involved in the democratic system in some way are unlikely to care about this, with just a few exceptions. This post is about one of those people, who does care, and blogs about it. With the rise of social media the internet has become a means of organizing in ways never thought possible before. People are far more interested in groups and movements than the state, and social media sites such as Facebook and Twitter have led us into an era where there is almost no time nor place when we can't find out what is happening elsewhere, other than the place we live. However, when it comes to elections it's a really different story, one that the US democracy has faced in each election in the last 50 years or so. Before this I would go further to say, that the US elections are more like a Civil War every 4 years than a bunch of people voting for the same politicians and parties. This is true in both parties. The Democratic Party goes back to the Civil War, the Republican Party was formed by a group of anti-slavery politicians who didn't want the Northern Democrats to be able to swing the election in their favor. Indeed, the whole thing is a bloody mess. The Democratic Party, the Republicans and the Democrats have all been in the same position over and over again. The system was designed for the two of them to fight over the whole country, an electoral college that always benefits the states that get more votes compared to the ones who get less, and then that usually favors the Democrats. Whenever there is an election the two of them compete over the whole country. However, even when one of them wins the majority of votes, they still don't have enough to even get over the top, which leads to the election of the minority of the states that always favors the Democrats. This system seems to be perfect for the Democrats, because not only can they always get their supporters from every corner, but they also get a balance of both
